▲ Manager's Comment

Newly released economic data in November do not support the change of our view on Chinese economy. While there are signs that aggregate demand has likely recovered in the recent quarter, it is still premature to say that the low point of growth is behind us. As of now, data probably reflect a bounce, of which duration is uncertain. China-US trade talk has re-entered limelight as deadline for tariff hike gets close. The outcome of the talk may alter market perspective for the next few quarters, but the longer term prospect of international trade environment remains clouded. Hence, Chinese government will likely put emphasis on domestic reforms in the planning of 2020.

At current yield levels, bonds have become more attractive than two months ago. Issuers in certain industries will likely find a more friendly market in 2020 when government policy adjusts towards stabilizing growth. Bonds of issuers in real estate-related industries, for instance, could be revalued accordingly. It's probably sensible to start looking for opportunities there.
